EFFECT OF WAR ON COTTON. If the difficulties between Grea Britain and the United States which now agitate the public minds of both now agitate the public minds of Both liberty we sing, nations, shall lead to war, the effect Just now were in the very mood to be 2ribute, "it is believed that Chiefwill, of course, be beneficial to the South, England, will, as at the States throw herself upon the market for cotton at any price in order to buy up a stock that will enable her to supply, if no other, at least her home Great Britain has increased ten or Of this they surely are aware, and this I be eagerly sought, and schemed and demand. The consuming power of fifteen per cent., and those who protess to know put her consumption of cotton at 62,000 bales per week, including 35,000 bales of American cottion will not continue if war follows upon the present diplomatic quarrel, but the falling off will not be very large, since the increased demand of the army and navy will to a great extent cover the loss of the American trade, England's trade with other nations will not be materially affected, because we have no navy, and as the Northern papers confess, cannot improvise one Besides these facts, there is the existing activity and eagerness in Liverpool for American cottons, which will be increased. Orders will come thick and fast, and for immediate fulfillment, should the war-cloud thicken. England must, in that event, and will increase her reserve stock. Prices will advance, and the present crop will be swept from the market as fast as steamboats, railroads, ships and steamships can carry it. The will be the first effect. The second will be deplorable and disastrous. Our next crop will be more completely blockaded than that of 1861-2-3-4, during our own war. The demand will be limited to home consumption, and that cannot be increased in any ratio that will afford even a moiety of relief. War for cotton is a present blessing, but a future curse. Let us build cotton mifls.
